

I live in the Oklahoma City metro-area and listen to KLOVE radio on an FM translator in the area. In addition to mainstream Christian music that is funded by listeners, they also provide local service announcements. I believe they provide a valuable service to our community in providing this type of music programming and believe it would hurt our community if LPFM took priority over translator stations such as ours. I also believe it is the public's best interest to allow translator stations to continue to operate as they are without out-prioritizing them with LPFM stations. If LPFM stations were to outplace KLOVE as a translator station, our metro area would be without a mainstream Christian music programming source. I believe that would be doing a disservice to all of us who listen (and support) this station. I also believe the translator station we listen to is family focused and is being a positive impact in each of the communities in which they broadcast. Given the amount of very non-encouraging, non-family friendly and non-positive impact stations on the airwaves in Oklahoma City, I would expect that more likely than not, we would see a replacement of a good community impact station replaced with another bad impact station. I don't have to worry what our three kids hear on the radio when we have this translator station on our radio – that isn't the case with almost any other station in the metro area.
